

mLINQS widens federal consulting services

E-Gov services company mLINQS LLC announced Dec. 13 that it has expanded its offerings for federal agencies. The Fairfax, Va.-based firm has added management consulting and software development services, under its servLINQ brand name, to its portfolio. These services are in addition to the company's targeted E-Gov travel services.

Greg McIntyre, mLINQS president, said the expansion is a natural progression for the company, which holds a federal supply schedule contract through the General Services Administration.

"We entered the federal market almost three years ago offering specialized consulting services for the E-Gov Travel Services initiative. At that time, we felt being highly focused was the best way for our firm to display its expertise and build solid relationships," he said. "We became profitable within weeks of opening for business. Now . . . it's time to take mLINQS to the next level."

The company is working on establishing and fulfilling information technology-based contracts with nine federal agencies, according to McIntyre.

The new services being offered include: certified project management, change management, capital planning, requirement analysis, systems analysis and in-house management of custom software development.

The company's technical competencies encompass web applications for Microsoft and Linux platforms on databases such as Oracle and Microsoft SQL Server, all fully compliant with the E-Gov Federal Enterprise Architecture.
